

Paul Brammer is a recent graduate from UFV in the History department, a former news editor from the Cascade Student Newspaper, pursuing graduate studies this autumn at the University of Manchester.

CRFC Student Fee Radio was provided for by a grant from the Community Radio Fund of Canada, intending to investigate and provide an opportunity for students, faculty and staff to engage in discourse with regards to the issues surrounding Student Fee levies, the way they're spent and their impacts on the learning and University experience of students and their community on campus. Sunny Mann is a student and spoken word artist, graduating this year, and Theresa Neel is one of UFV's two elders in residence. Theresa has filled a variety of student service roles in the last 30 years, and works with indigenous communities, and helped establish the Aboriginal Resource Centre on campus. Sunny and Theresa speak with Paul about the holistic experience that UFV students receive, and how it helps to shape their worldviews and development as community members in a diverse society. CRFC Student Fee Radio publicized and encouraged the opportunity for students of any background interested to speak about how they feel their Student Fee levies are being put to use at UFV, and about how they feel with regards to the campus culture at UFV, and the opportunities for student learning within and alongside their classroom experiences.
